This in itself does not suggest that the ongoing liquidation has been put on hold, but it is the first anniversary on which we were forced to consider whether the bull market still exists or actually peaked almost six months ago at 2940.9. Our instinct is that the latter will turn out to be the case, with much of what we have seen in the mean time consistent with the initial decline and recovery that mark the transition from the bull market to the market. We would still allow some possibility for a positive analysis, particularly for the equal weighted version of the SPX index, the SPX, which managed to clear the October/November/December triple peak before tipping this week. We remain more concerned about the Nasdaq 100, or NDX, and Russell 2000, or RTY, indices. The former has a useless concentration on megacap technology, much of which remains well below the top of the and the second is very sensitive to any deterioration in the structure of credit markets. The RTY certainly suffered the most on Wednesday, dropping 2%, the largest since late December. It is now very important that the RTY index manages to stay above base support at 1500, just over -2% below Wednesday's close at 1536. The SPX remains under rather less pressure, and will need to be drop below 2750 to show that drama-free recovery has run its course, and then drop below 2680 (the February B low) to show that clearance pressure is starting to crush the index. A simple breakout over the key 2900-2920 resistance zone certainly seems less likely, but whether this will lead to an unstable consolidation or a more damaging rollover and repetition remains to be seen. Pro-market is the fact that most U.S. economic data continue to show a strong domestic economy with no apparent weakness imported from elsewhere. The Federal Reserve has clearly shifted to a more patient stance, and trade negotiations with China seem more likely to lead to a settlement than not. Against this, it should be recognized that the strength of U.S. data was fully expected, and Citigroup's economic surprise index is actually negative at -34. Given the strength of consensus expectations, this does not indicate a weak or even weakened economy (these figures are usually misinterpreted by those who do not understand the nature of a surprise indicator rather than an indicator that measures the actual level of activity), but suggests that recent data reports were not as strong as expected. As far as the Federal Reserve is concerned, the break is not exactly the same as a monetary policy easing (we don't subscribe to the idea that interchange changes matter as much as actual changes in policy rates), though it's certainly better than continuing interest rate increases. --Michael Shaoul, Timothy Brackett,Jobless Claims Get a fall comment from Maria Fiorini Ramirez Inc.March 7: Seasonally adjusted initial unemployment claims for the week ending March 2 fell by 3,000, to 223,000, from a slightly revised 226,000 in the previous period (originally reported as 225,000). Today's result was very close to the median non-change forecast from the 225,000 originally reported last week (which was also our estimate). This data can be volatile from week to week, and so it is better to view it on a smooth basis. The four-week moving average was 226,000, followed by 229,000 last week and 236,000 the previous week. These are fairly low levels, although above the measurements reported earlier. Weak numbers in sales of new homes Economic Update from Regions Financialw. regions.comMarch 5: Sales of new homes increased at an annual rate of 621,000 units in December, on top of the consensus forecast of 585,000 units and our forecast of 572,000 units. At least for now-in terms of reliability, the initial estimate of sales of new homes in a given month is marginally better than the initial estimate of retail sales, a bar almost impossible not to clean. At that point, sales estimates in September, October and November were revised lower, sharply so in the case of November, with the initial estimate of an annual sales rate of 657,000 units now reported at 599,000. That initial estimate exceeded expectations puts new home unlike pretty much every other indicator of the housing market for the month of December, with single family leave and starts and existing home sales all falling far short of consensus expectations. The supply of new homes for sale amounts to 6.6 months from December, which we believe underestimates the extent to which the market for new homes remains underserved, even if not as deep as the market for existing homes. The median sales price of new homes fell 7.2% year-on-year in December, reflecting an ongoing, though disappointingly slow, shift in the sales mix. Regardless of the extent to which the initial estimate of December new home sales is revised in the coming months, we will repeat a point we have made before, which is that we believe there is more life left in the housing market than is implied by the soft fourth quarter data. On a non-seasonally adjusted basis, there were 44,000 new home sales in December, up from 45,000 in December 2017, but slightly above our forecast of 42,000 sales. The 27,000 sales in the southern region exceeded our forecast of 25,000, while sales in the Midwest, Northeast, and West areas matched our forecasts. Pending the review, the December figures put total 2018 new home sales at 622,000 units, an increase of 1.47% from 2017 sales. While these numbers seem to make 2018 the best year for new home sales since 2007, this is a somewhat hollow achievement, given how the pace of new home sales fizzled during the fourth quarter of 2018 and how generally slow sales of new homes have been. For the whole of 2018, sales increased by 8.57% in the Midwest, by 4.14% in the South, by 0.62% in the West and by 13.16% in the Northeast. --Richard F. Moody strong dollar, Common Sense Insights by Cresset CapitalMarch 7: The U.S. trade deficit widened to a 10-year high of $621 billion, according to Wednesday's Census Bureau report. The trade trend defies President Donald Trump's pledge to reduce U.S. dependence on imported goods, and shook his rhetorical fist at Federal Reserve President Jerome Powell, blaming him for the strong U.S. dollar. The president's financial connections are correct. The strength of the dollar encourages imports while hindering exports by making US dollar-based goods and services less competitive. Net exports of goods tend to follow the dollar's path with a six-month delay. This means that if the dollar does not reverse course and weaken quickly, the US trade deficit will likely worsen. --Jack Ablin To be examined for this section, material, with his name and address should be sent to MarketWatch@barrons.com.
